BRIEF EXPLANATION

Over the last few weeks, using the Loomis methode and evetually transitioning towards the Reilly method has been enriching and challenging. Reflecting on everything from the past few weeks I can with confidence say that there has been improvement from week one to week four.I really thought that transitioning from drawing from drawing skulls to drawing full portraits would be an easy move, especially since my skulls came out quite good.I was quickly proven wrong. Drawing these portraits came with came with a lot of challenges.

I found the Reilly method a lot easier to understand and use compared to the Loomis method. It felt more natural to me, and I was able to understand the structure of the face more easily. Throughout this process I learned the general placement of the facial features and strated to grow a better understanding of facial proportions and planes. My early portraits did not look right by applying the Loomis method. A lot of them ended up looking more masculine than I wanted even when I tried to draw a women.As the weeks progressed I really started to see improvement.

One of my personal favourite drawings was my first attempt at the Reilly method. The most interesting drawing since I ended up not using a reference. I initually just watched a video on how to use the Reilly method. That certainly boosted my confidence a bit. I did realise I tend to struggle drawing women even while using the Riley method. They often appear disformed or unintentionally masculine, which is certainly something I now know I need to work on. I did realize that I really enjoyed drawing masculine figures a lot more and often drawing female figures would give me anxiety. Another part I struggle a lot with is drawing hair it is very difficult to make it look natural. On a more positive note I also learned how to confidently use hathcing for the shading and this pushed me out of my comfort zone and would certainly open possibilities for me in my growth.
